The death of George Floyd, a Black man, at the hands of a Minneapolis police officer sparked nationwide outrage, highlighting the systemic racism and police brutality that persists in the United States. This tragic event has reignited the call for police reform and racial justice.

George Floyd was shot and killed by officer Derek Chauvin after being restrained in an incident caught on video. The video showed Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck for nearly nine minutes, despite Floyd's repeated cries of "I can't breathe.

This incident is part of a broader history of police brutality and racial profiling in the United States. The death of George Floyd has led to protests and rallies across the country, calling for an end to police violence and systemic racism.

In response to this event, President Joe Biden issued a set of police reform measures, including the creation of a police standards commission and the ban on no-knock warrants in federal drug cases.

As the nation grapples with the aftermath of George Floyd's death, there is growing pressure for police reform and greater accountability. The events of 2020 have underscored the urgent need for systemic change and a commitment to racial justice.
